Taken together, these trends will pose a challenge to Canada's ability to provide the increasingly skilled labour force required if Canada is to become a leading innovative economy and to improve its productivity performance. In a survey on adult education and training, Ferrer and Riddell make the following observation:

Milligan and Schirle SR I examine how each of the four components³ of the Canada

What levels of post-secondary education should be emphasized? One potential downside of targeting highly skilled immigrants is that raising the supply of skilled workers in the economy could reduce the skill premium and the return to investment in education, potentially leading to lower levels of skill investment by Canadian youth.

The categories are reconstructed to be mutually exclusive and exhaustive, and cultural effects of losing a job late in life have been intensively studied. A common theme running through all of these writings is that EI part I is structured to benefit seasonal workers facing temporary layoff more than full-time workers facing permanent layoff.
