A site may contain a number of process plants which themselves may occupy several plots, each of which typically contain many types of equipments as well as non-process plant and buildings. Petrochemical plants using chemicals from petroleum as a raw material or feedstock are usually located adjacent to an oil refinery to minimize transportation costs for the feedstocks produced by the refinery. In this study of design errors that occur most often in the CPI, plant layout emerges as the most prominent factor to blame. Reprinted with permission from [14]. Special issues published in Chemical Engineering Journal. The version of the layout process suggested here is typically only appropriate to the largest process plants.
