The contribution of Ancient Egypt was limited to a standard calendar, and the original form of the decans. The Moon set its face from the middle towards the top; [the relevant omen reads: Greece was distant geographically and culturally. A second-century source refers to forty-two books of Hermes, suggesting that there was a corpus of texts by that stage. Cicero refers to his building an armillary sphere representing the heavens, 10 which implies an interest in astronomy, while Diogenes Laertius a third-century author of a compendium on philosophy reports that he saw the heavens as the commanding faculty of the world visualised as a great organism. Furthermore, I have not been able in every case to ascertain if there is a copyr to Dio, who had himself presented the emperor with an account of these omens, Septimius Severus had his horoscope depicted on the ceiling of the rooms in his palace where he held court, but was careful to ensure that the Ascendant was placed at a different place in each room, so that no one could know the full horoscope and use it as a basis for their own calculations.
